			book, the Qur'an. When asked for examples when he had personally witnessed the mistreatment of the Qur'an, REDACTED could offer none. Instead REDACTED referred to general examples of claimed abuse, wherein soldiers, who were non-believers, had touched the book when searching it. Later in the conversation, REDACTED stated it was the interrogators he wanted to specifically single out as violators of any regulations regarding the Qur'an. For this he stated he had a specific message which he wished to pass to all interrogators. The use of the Qur'an as a weapon against detainees, REDACTED stated, had failed. Interrogators who had taken the Qur'an from individual detainees as a reprisal or as an incentive for cooperation had failed to sway the brothers and would continue to fail. The brothers REDACTED continued, would remain strong even without the Qur'an. The only thing which would result from these actions, REDACTED stated, would be the damage caused to the reputation of the United States once what had occurred was released to the world."

It was taken from them and returned at will, with little consideration for the value which they placed in the book. REDACTED was asked if he had ever seen the Qur'an mistreated or intentionally mishandled. He had not. REDACTED was asked if he had ever seen the Qur'an thrown around, tossed on the ground or mistreated in any way. He had not. . . . REDACTED was informed that his case for the proper treatment of the Qur'an had been taken to higher levels and presented as a serious issue. The effort had been hurt, however, because it had been found that detainees were hiding things within the pages of the Qur'an. He said that other actions by camp guards have also angered the detainees, such as some guards making fun of them while they are praying and having their Qurans taken away as punishment for breaking rules.
